

The President of United States of America

July 21st 1969

Dear fellow citizens, fate has certainly determined, that the men, whom flew to the moon, in order to investigate it peacefully, will rest there in peace. These courageous men knew, that it did not pass a hope on for them. In the ancient world humans looked to the stars, in order to recognize heroes in their constellations. Today this is not that much different, only our heroes are humans from meat and blood. Others will follow and will find their way home safely. The quest of humans will not be futile.
But these men will stay first. And in our hearts they will remain first. Because everyone, which looks up to the moon at night, will know that small marks of another world will always belong to mankind.
